Seeing is believing...or is it?

Understanding the authenticity of video evidence can make or break a case.

Video evidence is frequently used to support or dispute medical malpractice and general liability claims. Substantive video evidence can change the course of a case. At times, what looks like a valid video, upon expert analysis, may reveal authentication issues that can render the video evidence objectionable or inadmissible, thereby impacting the outcome of the case.

ICORP Investigations' Video Verification™ service helps medical malpractice and general liability attorneys avoid the authenticity problems associated with video evidence. Our expert video analysts help to authenticate or dispute a video based on a wide variety of technical factors including time studies and environmental analysis. ICORP's video analysts are licensed and trained investigators who understand how to go beyond the obvious and probe into technical aspects of the video.

Understanding the validity of video evidence helps attorneys avoid surprises and enables them to develop sound case strategies that take into account the credibility of case evidence.

Video Verification™ is a suite of expert video analyses that include:

- Video device analysis
- Time stamp and date stamp analysis (times does fly)
- Length and continuity of video evidence
- Environmental analysis
- Receipt and transfer of video analysis
- Raw data file review
- Edit software utilized
- Geo-location review
